CHAPTER I A GOOD START The long procession wound, snake-like, down York Street to the strains of a barbaric incantation. Dancing torches at the head shot far shadows through the overarching elms as the rows of men, with arms outstretched and locked together, swung aimlessly from curb to curb, now moving at a walk, then, as the music quickened, breaking into a run. The column, in its uncertain swaying, turned to the right, passed the Gymnasium, and entered High Street. Once across Wall, it suddenly straightened and, veering sharply to the left, swept over a vacant field. The advance-guard of three hundred men with torches stopped in the center, then pressed slowly outward, the circle, as it expanded, forcing back the dense crowd in its scramble for a view of the cleared space within. A chubbily built fellow breasted his way through a knot of...
